

FAIRFIELD UNIVERSITY GRADUATE PROGRAMS

DOCTOR OF NURSING PRACTICE — PSYCHIATRIC NURSE PRACTITIONER

PROGRAM DESCRIPTION

Fairfield University's Doctor of Nursing Practice (DNP) is a clinical doctorate in an advanced specialty of nursing practice. A DNP is comparable to clinical doctorates in other health disciplines such as pharmacy, physical therapy, and medicine. With a DNP, you'll be able to assume a leadership role in an increasingly complex healthcare system during this critical era of healthcare reform.

The Psychiatric Nurse Practitioner program prepares advanced practice nurses to sit for the ANCC exam for certification as a Psychiatric Mental Health Nurse Practitioner (PMHNP) so licensure as an advanced practice nurse can be obtained. Students learn to assess, diagnose, provide primary mental health care, and evaluate outcomes for individuals of all ages from diverse ethnic and socioeconomic groups suffering from a variety of mental illnesses including mood, substance abuse, anxiety, eating, trauma, and thought disorders. Psychotherapy and medication management are important components of the curriculum.

Clients range in age from children to older adults and are from diverse ethnic and socioeconomic groups. Clinical practice sites span the state and provide experiences in hospitals, community mental health clinics, private practices, palliative care, extended care, homecare, integrated behavioral care settings, correctional facilities, and schools.

DNP graduates are healthcare leaders who will care for a cohort of patients within their specialty, while using a cross-population perspective to assess, manage and evaluate common problems. Graduates will apply knowledge about organizations, business management, information technology and policy-making to improve systems of healthcare delivery. They are prepared for leadership roles as well as for advanced practice psychiatric nursing roles in a variety of settings.
